ACADEMIC PROFILE

Over the last twenty years my research has focused on legal and extra-legal factors jurors consider during the sentencing phase of capital trials. Currently, my research team of undergraduate and graduate students and I are empirically examining how positioning theory may help explain how jurors think about improper prosecutor argument. Applying a theoretical understanding within this framework has important implications within the context of the legal system. As an applied psychologist, I appreciate the importance of connecting theory to research and practice. In the classroom, I ask students to conceptualize real-world issues in terms of why rather than what. This is an especially challenging task as I have been primarily responsible for teaching research methods, statistics, and experimental psychology – courses that do not generally lend themselves well to this type of learning. It takes a great deal of practice to become skilled at how to form research questions based in theory. Once they have mastered how to connect theory with research and practice, they feel confident in their learning experience.
